A beautiful Japanese garden where you can feel the prosperity of the Edo period

Introduction

Daimyo Park was created in 1688. The name Daimyo Park (Feudal Lord Park) comes from the historical background, where powerful warriors of the Edo period were struggling to assert their power, and built Japanese gardens as a part of that competition. The scenery is lovely.

The park is spacious and features a lake that is designed to resemble Lake Biwa, Japan's largest lake. There are eight islands, connected by a bridge, and you can take in the beauty while walking around. The view from the red Yogetsubashi Bridge, the symbol of the park, is wonderful, and very popular among visitors.

The Marugame Art Museum is also co-located here. The museum features the Kaigakan, where pieces of the French Barbizon school are collected, the Tokikan, where you can see pottery from Persia dating from the BC era, and the I bentokan.

Next door there is the Japanese restaurant Kaifutei, where you can enjoy the garden lights as you have your evening meal.
